Not illustrated. 1845 Excerpt: ...small channels hewn in the floor conveyed it away to carriers still deeper. Another word, said Lachaussee, and we leave you to your own company in this dreary place. I ask no more, replied Louise, recoiling from him as he relaxed his hold. Let me be anywhere, so long that I am alone, and away from those fearful people. I am sorry you do not like them, said Bras dAcier; the more so as you will perhaps have to pass a little time amongst us. Only it would not have answered to have taken you from the sanctuary before them. They are particular in matters of religion. And he accompanied these last words with a horrid laugh. Do not take me among them again, M. Lachaussee, said Louise, I implore you. Let me remain here rather, even in this dismal vault. Pshaw! cried Lachaussee; you know not where you are. Look at those coffins--they have long since been despoiled of the festering contents, to hold Bras dAciers riches. You are below the cemetery of St. Medard, hemmed in on all sides by corpses, the accumulation of centuries. Would you like this for a companion? He stooped to pick up a skull, and held it in mockery over the flame of the lamp, which hideously illuminated it. Then, tossing it back to the corner of the chamber, he went on. The very air is redolent of mortality. The decay of ages, in some of the coffins, leaves but the food for that lamp which is now burning above us. Bras dAcier is an economist; and many of the quiet inhabitants of the cemetery become more useful to mankind in death than they ever were in lifetime. They form his flambeaux. Is there no one to aid me, cried Louise in agony, and shrinking from...
