Not illustrated. 1886 Excerpt: ... applauded. The noise only ceased when the curtain rose on a public place, and attention was arrested by the fight between Mercutio and Tybalt: those in the gallery were greatly disappointed that the former died off the stage, and only reconciled when Tybalt was killed by Romeo under their eyes. The scene that followed gave less promise of amusement. Juliet appeared in her room, invoking the approach of night:--Gallop apace, you fiery-footed steeds,. Towards Phoebus lodging. As she spoke her passionate monologue she came forward, and as she did so, the draught from her skirts made the jet of the broken footlight flare up. There should be a wire net about eighteen inches off the lamps, said Mr. Rigsby. I see none here, but in town it is so, is it not, Saltcombe? Lord Saltcombe bowed, he could not speak. Rachels eyes had met his at the exclamation, Give me my Romeo. The nurse entered, bringing the rope-ladder and the news of the death of Tybalt, which she delivers so badly that Juliet for the moment supposes she is told of the loss of her lover. This is the first occasion on which an actress of any power can show passion. Palma rose to it. With a piercing cry that rang through the house she rushed forward, threw up her arms, and was convulsed with agony. O break, my heart!--poor bankrupt, break at once I Then dashing her hands over her eyes,--To prison, eyes I neer look on liberty. Stooping, gathering up the dust, then throwing it down, as into a grave at a funeral,--Vile earth, to earth resign; end motion here: And thou, and Romeo She did not finish the sentence, the whole theatre rose with a cry of horror. The flame from the exposed jet had caught the white gauze of Juliets dress and danced up her skirt.

The agitation was indescribabl...
