

Kokoro / Japanese Inner Life Hints

[...]represents the result of a vast play of capacities with which the race had never been credited abroad, capacities of a very high order. The psychologist knows that the so-called adoption of Western civilization within a time of thirty years cannot mean the addition to the Japanese brain of any organs or powers previously absent from it. He knows that it cannot mean any sudden change in the mental or moral character of the race. Such changes are not made in a generation. Transmitted civilization works much more slowly, requiring even hundreds of years to produce certain permanent psychological results. It is in this light that Japan appears the most extraordinary country in the world; and the most wonderful thing in the whole episode of her [...].
