

Lost in Seoul (Lost in Seoul: part 1)

Back home I felt like an idiot jogging in place as I waited at crosswalks, but my bashfulness had abated enough after a month of awkward stares and odd encounters that I didnt care much any more. I told myself the old woman standing next to me that cold winter night probably would have stared at the oddly-dressed foreigner standing next to her even if he werent hopping in the air and wildly flailing his arms to stay limber and warm. I was inwardly amused when she turned to me and did just that. If she thought jogging in place was interesting, what would she think of this? I hopped in the air. I flung my arms about me as if I had lost all control of my body. And I did it all with a level of pride and gusto that would have made Richard Simmons blush... Stories from Korea.
