

Penelope Brandling

[...]boyish. It was altered, and it seemed at the time naturally enough, when he presently came down to the laundry and said very briefly, My brother is dead ... it is supposed a stab from a drunken sailor at Bristol. A shocking business. It is my Uncle Hubert who writes. He had sat down by the ironing table and spoke in short, dry sentences. There was something extraordinary about his voice, not grief, but agitation, which somehow made it utterly impossible for me to do what would have been natural under the circumstances, to put my arms round his neck and tell him I shared his trouble. Instead of which every word he uttered seemed to ward me off as with the swords point, and to cover [...].
