Not illustrated. 1904 edition. Excerpt: ...but the proprietor of the dining-rooms stated that he would find the gentleman as a matter of certainty at Bouttevilains. I assure you, on my honour, he left a little earlier than usual, for he had a business appointment with some gentlemen. But you'll find him, I tell you again, at Bouttevilains, in the Rue Saint-Martin, No. 92, the second row of steps at the left, at the end of the courtyard--first floor--door to the right! At last, he saw Regimbart, in a cloud of tobacco-smoke, by himself, at the lower end of the refreshment-room, near the billiard-table, with a glass of beer in front of him, and his chin lowered in a thoughtful attitude. Ah! I have been a long time searching for you! Without rising, Regimbart extended towards him only two fingers, and, as if he had seen Frederick the day before, he gave utterance to a number of commonplace remarks about the opening of the session. Frederick interrupted him, saying in the most natural tone he could assume: Is Arnoux going on well? The reply was a long time coming, as Regimbart was gargling the liquor in his throat: Yes, not badly. Where is he living now? Why, in the Rue Paradis Poissonniere, the Citizen returned with astonishment. , What number? 5 G. F.--ii Thirty-seven--confound it! what a funny fellow you are! Frederick rose. What! are you going? Yes, yes! I have to make a call--some business matter I had forgotten! Good-bye! Frederick went from the smoking-divan to the Arnoux's residence, as if carried along by a tepid wind, with a sensation of extreme ease such as people experience in dreams. He found himself soon on the second floor in front of a door, at the ringing of whose bell a servant appeared. A second door was flung open.

Madame Arnoux was seated...
