

The Struggles of Brown, Jones, and Robinson

It will be observed by the literary and commercial world that, in this transaction, the name of the really responsible party does not show on the title-page. IGeorge Robinsonam that party. When our Mr. Jones objected to the publication of these memoirs unless they appeared as coming from the firm itself, I at once gave way. I had no wish to offend the firm, and, perhaps, encounter a lawsuit for the empty honour of seeing my name advertised as that of an author. We had talked the matter over with our Mr. Brown, who, however, was at that time in affliction, and not able to offer much that was available. One thing he did say; As we are partners, said Mr. Brown, lets be partners to the end. Well, said I, if you say so, Mr. Brown, so it shall be. I never supposed that Mr. Brown would set the Thames on fire, and soon learnt that he was not the man to amass a fortune by British commerce. He was not made for the guild of Merchant Princes. But he was the senior member of our firm, and I always respected the old-fashioned doctrine of capital in the person of our Mr. Brown.
