Not illustrated. 1824 edition. Excerpt: ...dinner for his promising face and his complete taciturnity. Matters, however, were entirely changed with him. There he was a mere cipher; here he was lord of the ascendant, the choice spirit, the dominant genius. He sat at the head of the table with his hat on, and an eye beaming even more luminously than his nose. He had a quip and a fillip for every one, and a good thing on every occasion. Nothing could be said or done without eliciting a spark from him; and I solemnly declare I have heard much worse wit even from noblemen. His jokes, it must be confessed, were rather wet, but they suited the circle over which he presided. The company were in that maudlin mood, when a little wit goes a great way. Every time he opened his lips there was sure to be a roar; and even sometimes before he had time to speak. We were fortunate enough to enter in time for a glee composed by him expressly for the club, and which he sang with two boon companions who would have been worthy subjects for Hogarths pencil. As they were each provided with a written copy, I was enabled to procure the reading of it: .. M Merrily, merrily push round the glass, And merrily troll the glee, For he who wont drink till he wink is an ass. So, neighbour, I drink to thee. Merrily, merrily fuddle thy nose, Until it right rosy shall be j For a jolly red noBe, I speak under the rose, Is a sign of good company. VOL. I. O We waited until the party broke up, and no one but the wit remained. He sat at the table with his legs stretched under it, and wide apart; his hands in his breeches pockets; his head drooped upon his breast; and gazing, with lack-lustre countenance, on an empty tankard. His gaiety was gone, his fire completely quenched. My companion approached, and startled him from his...
