

The Countess of Escarbagnas

[...] Har. By George! This is fine, and I rejoice to see what I see. Coun. How! Mr. Receiver, what do you mean by this behaviour? Is it right to come and interrupt a comedy in that fashion? Har. By Jove, Madam, I am delighted at this adventure, and it shows me what I ought to think of you, and what I ought to believe of the assurances you gave me of the gift of your heart, and likewise of all your oaths of fidelity. Coun. But, really, one should not come thus in the middle of a play and disturb an actor who is speaking. Har. Hah! zounds, the real comedy here is the one you are playing, and I care little if I disturb you. Coun. Really, you do not know what you are saying. Har. Yes, d it, I know perfectly well; and MR. BOBINET, frightened, takes up the COUNT, and runs away; CRIQUET follows him. Coun. Fie, Sir! How wrong it is to swear in that fashion! Har. Ah! sdeath! If there is anything bad here, it is not my swearing, but your actions; and it would be much better for you to swear by heaven and hell than to do what you do with the viscount. Visc. I dont know, Sir, of what you have to complain; and if. Har. (to the VISCOUNT). I have nothing to say to you, Sir; you do right to push your fortune; that is quite natural; I see nothing strange in it, and I beg your pardon for interrupting your play. But neither can you find it strange that I complain of her proceedings; and we both have a right to do what we are doing. Visc. I have nothing to say to that, and I do not know what cause of[...].
