

The Moving Picture Girls Snowbound

Daddy is late; isn't he, Ruth?" asked Alice De Vere of her sister, as she looked up from her sewing. A little, answered the girl addressed, a tall, fair maid, with deep blue eyes, in the depths of which hidden meaning seemed to lie, awaiting discovery by someone. A little! exclaimed Alice, who was rather plump, and whose dark brown hair and eyes were in pleasing contrast to her sister's fairness. Why, he's more than an hour late, and he's seldom that! He promised to be back from the moving picture studio at four, and now it's after five. I know, dear, but you remember he said he had many things to talk over with Mr. Pertell, and perhaps it has taken him longer than he anticipated. Besides you know there are some new plans to be considered, went on Ruth. Mr. Pertell wants to get some different kinds of moving picture snow scenes, I believe and perhaps he has kept daddy to talk about them. But why are you so impatient? Are you afraid something has happened to him? Gracious, no! What put that idea into your head? Well, I didn't know whether you had noticed it or not, but poor daddy hasn't been quite himself since we came back from Oak Farm. I am afraid something is bothering him or worrying him. Perhaps it is his voice, though it has seemed better of late. I think not, said Ruth, slowly, as she bent her head in a listening attitude, for a step was coming along the hallway in the Fenmore Apartment, where the De Vere girls and their father had their rather limited quarters.
