Excerpt: ... Anna Vasilievna was fond of staying at home, as the reader is already aware: but sometimes, quite unexpectedly, she manifested an unconquerable desire for something out of the ordinary, some wonderful partie de plaisir; and the more difficult was this partie de plaisir, the more preparations and preliminary arrangements did it require, the more excited did Anna Vasflievna become, the more agreeable was it to her. If that mood descended upon her in the winter, she ordered that two or three adjoining boxes should be engaged, assembled all her acquaintances, and went to the theatre, or even to a masquerade; in the summer, she went somewhere out of town, the farther the better. On the following day, she complained of headache, groaned, and did not get out of her bed, and a couple of months afterward, the thirst for the out of the ordinary was again kindled within her. So it happened now. Some one referred, in her presence, to the beauties of Tzaritzyno,¹ and Anna Vasi
1 A village twelve miles from Moscow, with an unfinished palace, begun by Katherine II., and a park. To reach it from Kuntzovo, six miles from town), involves traversing the whole breadth of Moscow. ^translator. lievna suddenly announced that she intended to go to Tzaritzyno on the next day but one. The house was in an uproar; a special messenger sped to Moscow for Nikolai Artemievitch; with him also hastened the butler to purchase wine, pasties, and all sorts of edibles; Shubin was commanded to engage a calash and postilion (the carriage alone was insufficient), and to arrange for relays of horses; the page ran twice to Berseneff and Insaroff, and carried them two notes of invitation, written first in Russian, then in French, by Zoya; Anna Vasflievna busied herself with the travelling toilets of th...
