Not illustrated. 1855 Excerpt: ... Lycurgus there built, on the solid base Of equal life, so well a tempered state; Where mixed each government, in such just poise; Each power so checking, and supporting each; That firm for ages, and unmoved, it stood, The fort of Greece! without one giddy hour, One shock of faction, or of party rage. For, drained the springs of wealth, Corruption there Lay withered at the root. Thrice happy land! Had not neglected art, with weedy vice Confounded, sunk. But if Athenian arts Loved not the soil; yet there the calm abode Of wisdom, virtue, philosophic ease, Of manly sense and wit, in frugal phrase Confined, and pressed into Laconic force. There too, by rooting thence still treacherous self, The Public and the Private grew the same. An unfortunate description to apply to a close aristocracy like the government of Sparta, the vast majority of whose population consisted of helots, who had literally no rights at all, not even the right of living. For a system presenting anything like a resemblance to the Spartan polity, we must go to the native kingdoms of Hindostan, where the institution of caste is, as far as it goes, analogous to the insuperable distinctions which divided the Spartan citizen from the Blare. The children of the nursing Public all, And at its table fed; for that they toiled, For that they lived entire, and even. for that The tender mother urged her son to die. Of softer genius, but not less intent To seize the palm of empire, Athens rose. Where, with bright marbles big and future pomp, Hymettust spread, amid the scented sky, His thymy treasures to the labouring bee, And to botanic hand the stores of health; J Wrapt in a soul-attenuating clime, Between Ilissus and Cephissus glowed This hive of science, shedding sweets divine, Of active arts...
