They walked in silence as far as Titheburgh Abbey, indeed they both suffered from a curious constraint that seemed to effectually check their usual brother-and-sister-like relations. Ernest was just beginning to feel the silence awkward when Dorothy stopped. What was that? she said. I thought I heard somebody cry out. They listened, and presently both heard a woman's voice calling for help. The sound seemed to come from the cliff on their left. They stepped to the edge and looked over. As the reader may remember, some twenty feet from the top of the cliff, and fifty or more from the bottom, there was at this spot a sandy ledge, on which were deposited many of the remains washed out of the churchyard by the sea. Now this particular spot was almost inaccessible without ladders, because, although it was easy enough to get down to its level, the cliff bulged out on either side of it, and gave for the space of some yards little or no hold for the hands or feet of the climber. The first thing that caught Ernest's eye when he looked over was a lady's foot and ankle, which appeared to be resting on a tiny piece of rock that projected from the surface of the cliff; the next was the imploring face of Eva Ceswick, who was sprawling in a most undignified position on the bulge of sandstone, with nothing more between her and eternity than that very unsatisfactory and insufficient knob of rock. It was evident that she could move neither one way nor the other without being precipitated to the bottom of the cliff, to which she was apparently clinging by suction like a fly. Great God! exclaimed Ernest. Hold on, I will come to you. I cant hold much longer. It was one thing to say that he would come, and another to do i...
