Not illustrated. 1775 Excerpt: ... into a jeft; faid, The man was a Monk, and dreamt like a Monk, for lucre fake; and therefore commanded Fitzhamon to give him an hundred fhillings, that he might not complain he had dreamt to no purpofe. His vices appear to have been rather derived from the temper of his body, than any original depravity of his mind; for, being ot a languine complexion, wholly bent upon his pTeafures, and prodigal in his nature, he became engaged in great expencesc. To fupply c Not from his attachment to grofler pleaforesj. but from his vanity, ftudv: of magnificence, build lupply thefc, the people were perpetually oppreiled with illegal taxes and exa&ions; but that fort of avarice which arifes from prodigality and vice, as it is always needy, lb it is much more ravenous and violent than the other; which put the king and his evil inrrumeats (among whom Ralph, bifhop of Durham, is of fpécial infamy) upon thofe pernicious methods of gratifying his extravagances by all manner or opprerTion; whereof fome are already raentioned, and others are too foul to relate. He is generally taxed by writers for difeovering a contempt of religion in his common dileourfe and behaviour; which I take to have rifen from the fame fountain, being a point of art, and a known expedient, for men who cannot quit their immoralities, at lcaft.ro banifh all reflexions that may difturb them in the enjoyment, which muft be done ings, affectation of generality, and profufenefs in rewarding the bravery of his fldiers. The Monks bring againft him a general charge of inenntinency; but mention no particulars s No fpuriotu iffut is heard of; no miftrefs railed to rank and fplendour; not the name of any of his private favourites has reached us. Had he been as tradable to jlnfclm, as Eigar ...
