

Z. Marcas

[...]everything is linked to everything else. Some day perhaps we shall revert to the occult sciences. Do you not discern in that letter Z an adverse influence? Does it not prefigure the wayward and fantastic progress of a storm-tossed life? What wind blew on that letter, which, whatever language we find it in, begins scarcely fifty words? Marcas name was Zephirin; Saint Zephirin is highly venerated in Brittany, and Marcas was a Breton. Study the name once more: Z Marcas! The mans whole life lies in this fantastic juxtaposition of seven letters; seven! the most significant of all the cabalistic numbers. And he died at five-and-thirty, so his life extended over seven lustres. Marcas! Does it not hint of some precious object that is broken with a fall, with or without a crash? I had finished studying the law in Paris in 1836. I lived at that time in the Rue Corneille in a house where none but students came to lodge, one of those large houses where there is a[...].
